Haleakalā National Park, Hawai'i Volcanoes National Park, and Kalaupapa National Historical Park protect some of the country's most unique geological and cherished cultural landscapes, including two of the world's most active volcanoes— Kīlauea and Mauna Loa. Existing perimeter fencing was deteriorating, allowing invasive animals to enter and degrade the parks' unique ecosystem. This project is rehabilitating an estimated 64 miles of perimeter fencing to protect native ecosystems, species, and watersheds from invasive animals. Fencing also drastically improves visitor experience and safety by mitigating the risk of encounters with dangerous animals such as wild pigs. The project is also repairing two greenhouses, a potting shed, and a bughouse to support revegetation after construction.

GAOA LRF is funding Maintenance Action Teams (MATs) in the National Park Service and U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. MATs are teams of federal employees who can quickly mobilize across their region to complete smaller scope repair, demolition, rehabilitation, or historic preservation activities.

At the Pearl Harbor National Wildlife Refuge, MATs completed repairs to the popular Betty Bliss Memorial Overlook and boardwalk, reopening the popular birdwatching site to the public.
