

Heartbeat of the Pow-wow Nation featuring Anthony Yahola

June 16 - August 27, 2021

Anthony Yahola is a talented craftsman who specializes in decorative drumsticks. He is an enrolled member of the Muscogee Creek Nation of Oklahoma, a descendant of the Ponca Tribe of Oklahoma, the Seminole Tribe of Oklahoma, and the Otoe Tribe of Oklahoma. Mr. Yahola resides in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma.

During childhood Mr. Yahola was exposed to pow-wow singing and took an immediate interest. At age 12 he began singing in the Southern Style, a regional style of pow-wow singing in which songs are sung in a lower vocal range with a faster-paced tempo to create the melody. In his teenage years, he learned the Northern Style of singing which is characterized by the high-pitched falsetto and a slower rhythmic beat. Being around seasoned singers who used decorative drumsticks inspired him to produce his own

Once he acquired the general knowledge on how drumsticks were put together, Mr. Yahola began constructing his own style of percussion sticks. However, he soon realized he would need to advance his drumstick-making skills to a higher level to create the implements he admired. As his skills matured, the drumsticks he made became more ornate in decoration and durable in use. Today Mr. Yahola's talents are known throughout Oklahoma and across pow-wow country, providing him a large customer base.

The physical act of working with his hands brings him a feeling of being closer to his cultural heritage. From cutting the fiberglass rods to sewing the last stitch, each step in the process gives him a great sense of accomplishment. The work he produces is a representation of his people, and each drumstick is handcrafted with great care. Mr. Yahola draws inspiration from tribal colors and motifs in the decorative aspect of drumstick making.

This exhibit will be the first for Mr. Yahola and he is excited to be recognized in a professional setting.
